

Doll Museum Little Girls Delight

The heart of every little girl or lover of dolls would be swelled by a visit to the Little Women Doll Museum on South Main Street recently opened by Marian Beal.

Mrs. Beal's collection of dolls, hundreds of them, was inspired by her mother's and grandmother's affection for the lovely feminine creatures. In fact, the collection features the doll that perhaps started it all, the doll Mrs. Beal played with as a child, now three generations old.

"I thought it would be wonderful to have people see the dolls instead of having them packed away," Mrs. Beal said. "I've been looking for a place for four years," she said and added that she loves her new location, with its charming small rooms conducive to browsing and display.

Mrs. Beal explained that she lived in Europe for many years, allowing her to collect dolls from many countries but largely from France and Germany. Although not all the nations of the world are represented at the Doll Museum, the variety and beauty of the dolls there offer study in doll history and construction.

For instance, many of the dolls are made of bisque, paper mache, and celluloid; a few are made of wax, wood and porcelain. Their faces and time — which may date back as far as the 1700's. Most have synthetic and human hair; one boasts a head full of blonde lambs wool hair.

The dolls sit serenely in their glass cases, although we suspect that they enjoy a private night life, during the hours when all things inanimate come alive. But Mrs. Beal pointed out that some of the dolls do have purposes aside from the decorative. There is a walker, a waltzer, a mechanical music box doll, and a special personage of three faces, with a revolving laughing, sleeping and crying head.

Mrs. Beal feels that preservation is important for her dolls now but remarked, "I always played with my dolls. I think they should be played with. My granddaughter will just sit with them on her lap for hours and hold them."

The Little Women Doll Museum offers more than a doll exhibition, the shop sells doll houses, furniture, and doll-related articles. They will have antique replica dolls for sale in the future and no, they don't make repairs.
